Focusing on concepts, methods, key issues, and applications, the course aims to provide the knowledge and research tools needed to conduct and develop translational and transdisciplinary research and interventions to eliminate health disparities. The course content is developed in the context of the history of health and health disparities in the United States, and addresses biological and non-biological determinants of health and a range of social, political, economic, cultural, and legal theories related to health disparities.

8/15/16 – 8/19/16

T32 Training Grant: Research on Vulnerable Women, Children, and Families (T32NR007100)

The purpose of the training program is to study multi-system level factors that contribute to health disparities among vulnerable women, children, and families; to develop expertise in cutting-edge, culturally-appropriate interdisciplinary research strategies with the potential to identify and reduce health disparities with a focus on bio-behavioral, descriptive and intervention methods; collaborate with interdisciplinary scientist and community leaders and to develop values, critical thinking, communication skills and research expertise that address the power differentials that create, sustain, or augment health disparities in vulnerable populations.

RESEARCH

Doctoral Dissertation:

“I Told Them Leave It Alone, It’s Our Center”: Midwives’ Collaborative Activism in Two U.S. Cities, 1970-1990.

The purpose of this historical research was to explore the means through which activist midwives in two northeastern cities collaborated, negotiated, and sometimes conflicted with numerous stakeholders in their struggle to reduce infant mortality. Infant mortality within the black community has been a persistent phenomenon in the United States, despite a growing dependence on advancing medical technologies and medical models of birth. Studies in the early twentieth century typically marked poverty as the dominant factor in infant mortality affecting black communities. Refusing to accept poverty as a major determinant of infant mortality within marginalized populations of women, nurse-midwives during the 1970s and 1980s harnessed momentum from the growing women’s health movement and sought alternative methods toward change and improvement of infant mortality rates.

Ecological Systems Affecting Urban, Childbearing Puerto Rican Women in the City of Philadelphia (2015 to 2020)

The initial product of my post-doctoral studies, this qualitative research study seeks to understand the socio-ecological factors behind the disparate maternal-newborn outcomes within the Puerto Rican urban community. A combination of 24 individual interviews as well as 3 focus groups were employed to gain a deep understanding of the women’s lives. Factors on all levels of the study’s conceptual framework were compounded the effects of stressors and restrictions on the lives of urban childbearing Puerto Rican women. The intersectionality of issues for Puerto Rican women create overlapping and independent systems of potential disadvantage. Living within low resourced and violent geographic contexts, the women are forced to contend daily with extraordinary amounts of overwhelming pressure.

A Narrative Analysis of Health and Social Consequences in the Everyday Lives of Urban-Dwelling Puerto Rican Childbearing Women: Fuerza y Tenacidad

Funded by an inaugural STT and NAHN grant, this secondary analysis, qualitative research study employs narrative analysis to examine the stories of urban, childbearing Puerto Rican women's lives (from the initial 2015 study) as they relate to health and social consequences of the Latina and her family. Three major plot types were identified from the data leading to novel findings that have not been identified in other qualitative studies. This study harnesses the power of storytelling and metaphor as a way to understand the meaning of these women's lives with a long term goal of designing appropriate and relevant interventions.

The Use of Alternative Therapies to Decrease Perceived Stress in Minority Women: A Feasibility Study (2021 in Progress)

Funded by a grant from the Foundation of the National Student Nurses Association and the Promise of Nursing, this mixed method research study will use several alternative therapies to mitigate the impact of various trauma experiences on women living in the Kensington Neighborhood of Philadelphia. This study is in the IRB review process at this time. The study results will provide data to build best interventions for this community of women.

Community and Stakeholder Outreach

Community Center at Visitation

2016 to 2020: I initiated Women's Saturday events every 2 to 3 months at the Community Center at Visitation (CCV) with undergraduate nursing, pre-med, and law students (Team Latina/Team Kensington). Events were designed to be both educational based upon what the community felt was needed as well as time for socialization with raffles and other activities. Students provided babysitting services for the women so they could partake in the events.

Thea Bowman Center

2020 to 2021: Before the onset of the COVID-19 Pandemic, Team Kensington worked with Medical Mission Sisters at the Thea Bowman Center, run by the Medical Mission Sisters. It functioned as a "safe space" where women who were experiencing homelessness and/or housing insecurity could receive two hot meals, access to shower and laundry facilities as well as computers. Team Kensington students assisted with all facets of this program. One of the most important interventions the students provided was listening to the women and being a safe person for them to share (if they chose to share) their various life stories and traumas. Due to the onset of COVID-19 and the need to safely space people apart from one another, operations at the Thea Bowman Center stopped.

Community Center at Visitation

Onset of COVID-19 to present: Team Kensington worked with CCV administrators and staff to initiate a Saturday outreach in the gymnasium of CCV. Programming provided educational and recreational activities for the women of the community. Team Kensington worked with various Philadelphia artists and organizations and initiated bi-monthly Saturday Women's Events with classes covering a variety of topics such as: cooking, gardening, pottery, and poetry. A field trip to an animal sanctuary was held with the women enjoying an entire day on a 33 acre animal farm sanctuary.

2021-present: Team Kensington initiated a Monday morning Wellness Clinic that runs simultaneously with the volunteer staffed food pantry. Students assess community members with a health history, vital signs assessment and blood sugar testing.

Prevention Point Philadelphia

June through August 2020: I initiated a relationship with Prevention Point Philadelphia in an effort to expose students to the various services in the Kensington community. Prevention Point Philadelphia is a non-profit public health organization providing the Kensington community with harm reduction services for those suffering from substance abuse disorder. Team Kensington students developed and ran a foot clinic providing the opportunity for any community member to experience a relaxing foot soak, foot care teaching as well as a documented foot assessment. The students also had the opportunity to gain in depth knowledge regarding the opioid crisis in Kensington as well as instruction on Narcan administration and resuscitation in the case of suspected opioid overdose.
